Abstract

Are matter and consciousness these two different realities? Or are they one reality, appearing as two? Modern science has devoted considerable effort to establish that there is only one reality, the matter. And, the consciousness is considered as a phenomenon dependent on the matter. This paradigm not only leads to an unsatisfactory explanation, but also there are unresolved issues in explaining the phenomenon of conscious experience. Is there any alternative? Can consciousness be considered a reality independent of material properties? This article explores the possibility of explaining consciousness independent of material properties.
